Treating skin with topical alcohols is a widely accepted method of skin care and is associated with increased rates of wound healing and decreased incidence of skin cancer. To begin to understand the molecular basis for these beneficial effects of alcohols, we examined the effects of a variety of alcohols on the expression of cell surface antigens (CD) and on the activity of epidermal growth factor (EGF)-induced epidermal growth factor receptor (EGF-R) tyrosine phosphorylation and EGF-induced growth. Topical application of ethanol, isopropanol, and 1-butanol at concentrations of 20% and 40% for 24 h to cultured human keratinocytes reduced the CD45 and CD25 expression compared with untreated control. By contrast, the expression of CD29, CD44, CD62, and CD95 were not affected. Concanavalin A stimulation was not affected by 20% isopropanol, but significantly reduced CD62 and CD95 expression in 40% isopropanol-treated cells. The expression of CD18 and CD44 was significantly increased after 4% ethanol and 20% isopropanol treatment, but was not affected by 40% isopropanol. The ability of keratinocytes to phagocytose was also enhanced by 20% ethanol and isopropanol, but 40% ethanol had the opposite effect. The growth of keratinocytes in 20% isopropanol-treated cultures was inhibited by 60% compared with untreated control. The inhibition of growth by 40% isopropanol was associated with increased expression of EGF-R. The expression of EGF- 1d6a3396d6
