Optic nerve hypoplasia in two brothers with a splice site mutation in an intron of the rhodopsin gene. To describe the clinical features in two brothers with optic nerve hypoplasia (ONH), who carry a splice site mutation in the intron 12 of the rhodopsin gene. Patient 1 was a 15-year-old boy who showed yellow sclera and an optic disk not visible with direct ophthalmoscopy. He had night blindness since he was 2 years old. Patient 2 was his younger brother. He showed unremarkable sclera and optic disk, and night blindness since the age of 2 years. Pedigree and clinical data were collected. Genomic DNA was extracted from peripheral blood leukocytes, and a gene fragment comprising intron 12 of the rhodopsin gene was amplified. Direct sequencing of the amplified DNA was performed. The splice site mutation c.1701 + 5G > A, which affected intron 12, was found in the two probands. The two brothers had a common heterozygous mutation of intron 12 of the rhodopsin gene. Homozygosity of this mutation was predicted to cause a decrease in rhodopsin biosynthesis in photoreceptor cells. No obvious electroretinography abnormalities were observed. A splice site mutation affecting intron 12 of the rhodopsin gene is a possible etiology of ONH in our patients. The role of 4D flow MRI in the postoperative assessment of carotid endarterectomy. Carotid endarterectomy (CEA) is the standard treatment for carotid stenosis. However, there is no agreement on the optimal timing of the postoperative assessment. The aim of our study was to evaluate whether postoperative 4D flow magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) could be used to differentiate restenosis from pseudoaneurysm of the anast 595f342e71
